Re: Endorsement for an organic agriculture and food system extension service in British Columbia

I am writing on behalf of the Islands Trust Council to express their endorsement of the Kwantlen Polytechnic University's Institute for Sustainable Food Systems' development and implementation of an organic agriculture and food system extension service in British Columbia.

This extension service has the potential to contribute to the Islands Trust Council's strategic priorities for ecosystem preservation and protection and, climate change mitigation and adaptation including food security.

An organic extension service active in the Islands Trust Area would support the Islands Trust Council's strategic priorities through programs, resources, and connections that would be available to support the sustainability and viability of farms and food businesses located within the Islands Trust Area. This, in turn, will have significant influence on areas of strategic priority including ecosystem preservation and protection, climate change mitigation, and food security within the Trust Area.

We support an extension service accessible to and inclusive of all farmers and processors, regardless of organic certification status or inclination. This approach would mean that more of the farming residents within the Trust Area will have an opportunity to embrace organic agriculture principles. We have heard from First Nations about concerns they have with organic and non-organic run-off from farms contaminating shellfish harvesting areas and other marine food resources. We encourage any extension program to take a broad view of food security and ensure that on-farm practices do not jeopardize or contaminate natural food systems.
